Mandy Hale once said, "If you learn to really sit with loneliness and embrace it for the gift that it is...an opportunity to get to know you, to learn how strong you really are, to depend on no one but you for your happiness...you will realize that a little loneliness goes a long way in creating a richer, deeper, more vibrant and colorful you." I grew up in the land of many waters.

Beautiful Operation

A tropical place where the sun was always blistering hot and coconut trees were all over my yard. ^{this land was Guyana, South America.} South America, Guyana an English-speaking country with strong traditions of cricket and calypso music. ^{this place was} A place so different yet, I couldn't just be different. ^{allow myself to be different than others in America} An unfortunate victim of peer pressure I was, I let my friends and surrounding define the things I did and the ultimate way I react towards the hitherto situations. ^{Start a new paragraph here} "Black women are hypocritical, loud mouthed and unprofessional." I push to shatter these stereotypes. ^{Start a new paragraph for subtopic 2} As a young woman in today's society, I am very much aware of the pre-existing barriers that are presented to me on a daily basis. I attended a school that lacks the sufficient funds and space for me and my peers. I see on the news, ^{and} the lives lost to negligence, while hearing the stories of minorities falling wayside because they lack educational opportunities. These barriers cannot and will not deter me from my inevitable success. Embracing the premise that my life itself is predetermined based on my sex, race and religion does nothing but create more barriers, ^{which is} and something I cannot allow to occur. My confidence, focus and positive outlook on life can be met with criticisms. Countless times I have
