

Practice and failure is a stepping stone into building an artist's persona. Some may believe art is a hobby rather than a career. But, true artists understand the amount of time and effort put into each design. Occasionally, an artist's may struggle, but a sense of creativity never leaves their work. I can relate to these artists. Before I explain my art, I must first properly introduce myself. My name is Andy Ferreira, and I am an artist. When I was young, animation, videogames, and urban art became a valuable influence in my life, and my artwork. I remember watching cartoons, playing countless amount of videogame, and doodling every character I saw.

Eventually, I grew older and wanted to pursue a career as a designer. But, I was mocked by others. They told me to pursue a real job. My peers constantly told me I would never make it. My parents were a prime example. They wanted me to become doctor, but I wasn't passionate about the medical career. Instead of quitting my dream of becoming a designer, I proved myself. I focused on my illustrations. I used photography as a hobby to mellow my mind, and the internet for research. And my art improved.

I soon developed extraordinary skills illustrator/ animator, photographer, and produced a passion for web design. Soon after, my design, and style, was highly recognized by others. Even those who didn't believe in me at first, eventually respected me, when I grew older. Even my parents were proud of what I had become. I fought to become a proud designer, and I will continue to fight again to prove myself.
