Sunnie Brown in Ted Talk talked about how doodling works in school and office. She talked about some history of the words' meaning in the past. She states that doodling can help people to learn better than the people who don't. It connects to the 4 styles of learning and emotion.

In the video, Sunnie Brown explains the different definitions of doodle from the past. Doodle in the 17th century is a simpleton that means a fool, came to the 18th century it became to swindle, to ridicule, use to make fun of someone. In the 19th century, the meaning change to a corrupt, and politician. For today, the meaning of the word 'doodle' is to dawdle, to dilly dally, to monkey around, and to do less work. But the easiest and direct meaning is to do nothing.

She also states the 4 different style learning which is visual, auditory, reading/writing, and kinesthetic. She states that a person can use these methods with an emotional experience or use more than one method to do it.

She says that people who do doodling in schools and offices often get a rebuke. However, on the other hand, people who doodle learned more than the people who don't. She said that doodle is a kind of visual language that can break serious learning. And it also can be a criminal act that we can see people's personalities and psychology by their doodle they do.

In conclusion, Sunni Brown found out a lot of evidence to show that doodle can help us in our work and improve our learning. She really wants people to know this and change the view of doodle
