Edensor and Lynch

The similarities are identity, structure, and meaning. Identity is to distinguish the difference from others, like a place or a performance. Structure is the space and pattern between the object and the observer. The structure can be different depends on different people. Lastly, a place can be functional or just to experience the emotion. They both discuss about space in various forms.

For Edensor, it mentions the use of space, which is the performance. They have multiple structures of performance in the city. They use media and space to help them to identify, but they are disoriented. However, for Lynch, they mention construction in space. Basically, they use mental image or a map that shows the legibility to make things organized and easily identify. They are absolute oriented because they use image, or an environmental image to guide their direction. They even use the types of elements, like path, landmark, edge, node, and district to help them to remember the place and oriented themselves.
