

IMMENTAL

N Something that annoys them no matter what. Whether it's a person, sound, object or something happening it's annoying. My worst pet peeve is interruptions or being cut off. When I'm talking, in a car, in line, anything, at all. If I'm cut off or someone who overtakes me, it's like the worst thing in the world to me. I absolutely despise the person for it and give them a look. —R.H My own pet peeve is to be constantly stared at. As an anxious and timid person, I like to not be at the center of attention and avoid confrontation if possible. I personally find extremely aggravating when a person or multiple people are looking at me for no reason in particular. —M.D.

D When someone sticks their chopsticks upward in bowl when they're done with their food instead of laying it flat down. It is my pet peeve because in most Asian cultures, we find that disrespectful. It imitates an incense used when someone passed away. It is disrespectful to the person that is sitting across from you especially because it is like saying they are dead, so you are giving them incense. It's a table manner. —S.L. My biggest pet peeve is loud noises. Usually for me this ranges from people talking, falling objects, barking, fighting, and much more. Loud noises can be extremely irritating for me. —M.L. My biggest pet peeve is when people talk loud on their phones. I find it worst when I take public transportation. It's irritating to me because the bus or train can be peaceful and then all of a sudden, someone breaks that quietness and starts yelling into their phones. —A.P. Poor drivers, those who drive without regard for those on the lane, are my pet peeve. Slow drivers, fast drivers, and others who cannot obey basic traffic instructions are also examples of poor drivers.

DRIVING There are also drivers who are unable to keep in their lanes or who turn too quickly at a stoplight, almost colliding with others. —C.R. In my personal pet peeves list, passive aggression hits the number one spot, especially The Silent Treatment. Passive aggressive behavior is a mannerism where a person indirectly expresses their bitter and resentful feelings instead of addressing them openly. If I ever sense that there is an issue to dispute or the atmosphere is off, I will do all I can to resolve it. Nothing I hate more than a person who shows that there is something wrong or that they are uncomfortable with a situation but too stubborn to say what they are feeling. —A.V.

PET PEEVE One of my pet peeves is when people tend to interrupt me when I am working on my personal projects on my laptop. I usually get interrupted by a scammer phone call, my parents talking loudly in the background even though the door is closed or if anyone slams open the door to my room. In terms of getting interrupted during a conversation in not really an issue but in terms of work, yes it does annoy me. —S.L.

PET PEEVES

DENIMENTAL DRIVING

Something that annoys them no matter what. Whether it's a person, sound, object or something happening it's annoying.

My worst pet peeve is interruptions or being cut off. When I'm talking, in a car, in line, anything, at all. If I'm cut off or someone who overtakes me, it's like the worst thing in the world to me. I absolutely despise the person for it and give them a look. —R.H My own pet peeve is to be constantly stared at. As an anxious and timid person, I like to not be at the center of attention and avoid confrontation if possible. I personally find extremely aggravating when a person or multiple people are looking at me for no reason in particular. —M.D. When someone sticks their chopsticks upward in bowl when they're done with their food instead of laying it flat down. It is my pet peeve because in most Asian cultures, we find that disrespectful. It imitates an incense used when someone passed away. It is disrespectful to the person that is sitting across from you especially because it is like saying they are dead, so you are giving them incense. It's a table manner. —S.L. My biggest pet peeve is loud noises. Usually for me this ranges from people talking, falling objects, barking, fighting, and much more. Loud noises can be extremely irritating for me. —M.L. My biggest pet peeve is when people talk loud on their phones. I find it worst when I take public transportation. It's irritating to me because the bus or train can be peaceful and then all of a sudden, someone breaks that quietness and starts yelling into their phones. —A.P. Poor drivers, those who drive without regard for those on the lane, are my pet peeve. Slow drivers, fast drivers, and others who cannot obey basic traffic instructions are also examples of poor drivers. There are also drivers who are unable to keep in their lanes or who turn too quickly at a stoplight, almost colliding with others. —C.R. In my personal pet peeves list, passive aggression hits the number one spot, especially The Silent Treatment. Passive aggressive behavior is a mannerism where a person indirectly expresses their bitter and resentful feelings instead of addressing them openly. If I ever sense that there is an issue to dispute or the atmosphere is off, I will do all I can to resolve it. Nothing I hate more than a person who shows that there is something wrong or that they are uncomfortable with a situation but too stubborn to say what they are feeling. —A.V. One of my pet peeves is when people tend to interrupt me when I am working on my personal projects on my laptop. I usually get interrupted by a scammer phone call, my parents talking loudly in the background even though the door is closed or if anyone slams open the door to my room. In terms of getting interrupted during a conversation in not really an issue but in terms of work, yes it does annoy me. —S.L.

DENIMMENTAL DRIVING

BEAUFURNER

Something that annoys them no matter what. Whether it's a person, sound, object or something happening it's annoying. My worst pet peeve is interruptions or being cut off. When I'm talking, in a car, in line, anything, at all. If I'm cut off or someone who overtakes me, it's like the worst thing in the world to me. I absolutely despise the person for it and give them a look. —R.H My own pet peeve is to be constantly stared at.

As an anxious and timid person, I like to not be at the center of attention and avoid confrontation if possible. I personally find extremely aggravating when a person or multiple people are looking at me for no reason in particular. —M.D.

When someone sticks their chopsticks upward in bowl when they're done with their food instead of laying it flat down. It is my pet peeve because in most Asian cultures, we find that disrespectful. It imitates an incense used when someone passed away. It is disrespectful to the person that is sitting across from you especially because it is like saying they are dead, so you are giving them incense.

It's a table manner. —S.L.

My biggest pet peeve is loud noises. Usually for me this ranges from people talking, falling objects, barking, fighting, and much more. Loud noises can be extremely irritating for me.

—M.L. My biggest pet peeve is when people talk loud on their phones.

I find it worst when I take public transportation.

It's irritating to me because the bus or train can be peaceful and then all of a sudden, someone breaks that quietness and starts yelling into their phones. —A.P. Poor drivers, those who drive without regard for those on the lane, are my pet peeve. Slow drivers, fast drivers, and others who cannot obey basic traffic instructions are also examples of poor drivers. There are also drivers who are unable to keep in their lanes or who turn too quickly at a stoplight, almost colliding with others. —C.R. In my personal pet peeves list, passive aggression hits the number one spot, especially The Silent Treatment. Passive aggressive behavior is a mannerism where a person indirectly expresses their bitter and resentful feelings instead of addressing them openly. If I ever sense that there is an issue to dispute or the atmosphere is off, I will do all I can to resolve it. Nothing I hate more than a person who shows that there is something wrong or that they are uncomfortable with a situation but too stubborn to say what they are feeling.

—A.V. One of my pet peeves is when people tend to interrupt me when I am working on my personal projects on my laptop. I usually get interrupted by a scammer phone call, my parents talking loudly in the background even though the door is closed or if anyone slams open the door to my room. In terms of getting interrupted during a conversation in not really an issue but in terms of work, yes it does annoy me. —S.L.