

What I learned today that storyboards are very important when it comes to video making. Also I learned about video and film is that there are many transitions and intros to engage an audience for certain scenes. Many movies and shows such as dark knight and tom and Jerry are perfect examples of different or different types of shots that are put in. Editing videos and shots also give different types of views.

During my time also outside side digital media I am also taking intro to video. I learned that the equipment and types of camera does not really matter because it's about what I can gain and the type of content I can create. As a first assignment I did a storyboard about a commercial which was the Doritos dance with lil nas. After I did this assignment what I learned is that is a perception of what I saw in the commercial.

Within the learning video the different shots that I have learned are dolly and closeup. The closeup demonstrations are mostly showing detail but not a bigger picture. With a dolly it only shows with a camera movement it moves toward a subject. This is very useful. It gives me an idea of what is important and what are the smaller things within it.

Finally I learned that filmmaking is a long process to do. It requires patience and sitting down like to sit and edit videos. Overall anything type of technology can work that includes phones and photography photos. Many ideas come from creativity and heart. The storyboard is a smaller version of a script.
