Olympic Games Pictograms

- “It should have the following characteristics: easy identification, clear visualization, accessibility and legibility, and clear graphic representation.”

- “Because pictograms are used during the Olympic events, they must be visually acceptable to people from various cultural backgrounds; they must also be understood easily, quickly, and accurately by the general public.

Mexico City, Mexico

SUMMER 1968

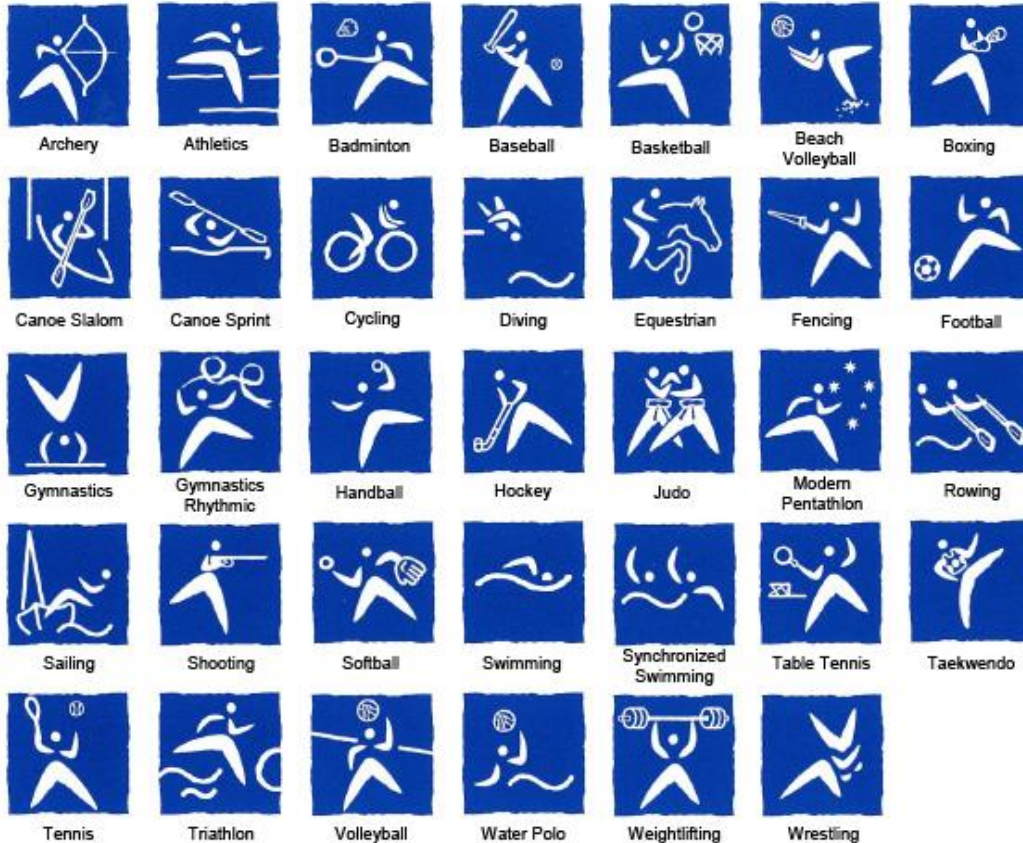

These pictograms represent the Mexican culture and history, since pre-Hispanic glyphs (in special the Huichol Indians) was the bases for their design.

Sydney, Australia

SUMMER 2000

For the Sydney 2000, the designer committee created a series of pictograms based on his logotype. Each pictogram is composed of boomerangs that represent the natives of Australia.

Athens, Greece

SUMMER 2004

For the pictograms of Athens 2004, the Olympic Designers were inspired by the Cycladic Figures and the Ancient Greek vases. Their objective was to express the Greek heritage in a modern and understandable way.

Beijing, China SUMMER 2008

Chinese Characters were initially formed by pictograms. The early Chinese writing was made by symbols. These pictograms looks like a Chinese character but at the same time is recognizable to all the international audience.
