Education?...

“I was self taught in high school. I went to the Rhode Island School of Design for college, which gave me the space and time to work on my craft and explore various techniques and styles. One of the biggest things I learned at RISD was the value of working with my hands. The first year you don't go into the major, you work in all sorts of analog crafts like woodworking, painting, sculpture, etc. I ended up applying that knowledge back into my love for design and typography. I also met people in that year from other majors and I started learning the value of creative collaborations and working with others to help execute creative concepts.”
