

Connecting and Collaborating

Image from

https://www.freepik.com/free-photo/people-using-digital-devices-smart-technology-double-color-exposure-effect_15667172.htm#fromView=search&page=1&position=0&uuid=074ace3e-3ec2-444b-ac53-cc7439cc40ba&query=Collaborative+Connection

Collaborating is one of the important aspects when it comes to working. Over the past few weeks, I've been collaborating closely with my supervisor and other team members. As we're a remote team, the communication has been through Microsoft Teams, which the supervisor set up during my interview. We've been working on several social media projects, with the supervisor assigning tasks and deadlines for each one. Right now, we're focusing on creating assets for social media, including posts and banners for various platforms.

Most of our communication happens remotely, and it's been quite efficient. We use Microsoft Teams for daily updates and announcements, with the team responding quickly and keeping the momentum going. There's always a clear exchange of feedback, making sure that designs align with both the client's goals and the team's vision.

Although the company is fully remote, the communication and collaboration have been smooth, thanks to Microsoft Teams. It's helped me stay connected with the rest of the team, and I've even had the chance to briefly meet other interns of the company. Through these meetings, I understand the company's work culture and its process by seeing how my design work fits into the larger picture.

I also met our members that are also part of the internship. Meeting with people online in a group chat on Microsoft Teams is important because it keeps everyone connected and organized, especially when working remotely. It provides space where team members can share updates, ask questions, and collaborate. Even allows for direct messaging, and video calls, making communication more efficient. Overall, it promotes clear, consistent communication, making teamwork smoother and more effective.