

Reflection

By Ashley Dunlap

For the final project, I thought the process would be much more complicated than the end result this group has accomplished. From the initial concept to the final result, my focus was producing the best product.

I have a love for Twitter that allows me to be comfortable sending and replying to tweets. When coming up with hashtags, I spent some time on Google looking through teaching blogs and articles for common themes and Twitter lists that relate to the topic that was picked. Initially it seemed simple to have at least three hashtags per post but once I started counting characters it really was a choice of what's important. That will always be the constraint of Twitter. Posting the tweets was fun because it is entertaining but still helpful to students. Also, I was able to link back to all of the other components that were created for the benefit of this assignment.

While group work isn't always the easiest to do. The work that was able to produce for this assignment came with little confusion. This taught a valuable lesson of what it takes to successfully work with others. It did not feel like a group of students putting together a project, but young professionals preparing for the work world. I am excited to share the final result and hope that the information gathered and help students on the road to graduation.
