

The young millennials and gen Z crisis - wyeon james

As elementary as it sounds parents should be assessing themselves, what crisis could my kids possibly go through or going to have to go through because it is as Thanos said the inevitable. well to start the standing number of unemployed college graduates stands at 53%. That is depicting to you that your kids may work a job that doesn't utilize their degree, as you can tell by the 53% that are jobless some wouldn't even get a job at all. Research shows the importance of having the knowledge to know if what you learn in schools can be transferred in the real world where your kids would reside to work it's not exactly like you can go back to college and say I want a refund it is a done sealed deal! The odds of finding a match between a college degree and a job are about 6 percentage points higher in a place like New York City than in, say, Syracuse says brad plumber author from the Washington Post. It's little things like this information that can make a difference on if your child would receive employment in the future but not to fear I'm here to give you the full scope. The decision for some change in all components of the schooling system is at an all-time high that's why so many students turn out to be dropping out or taking longer than wanted to complete their publications and requirement in order to move along in their journey. How about instead of focusing solely on getting money for programs turn the focus back on the students that need to be educated on the little things that they may not know play a role in their future endeavors.

orange county local news report

By chance did your child come home absolutely blue in the face one day from school and went straight to their room and never came back out. What if I told you school affects your kid's mental health surprised? well, I'm not given that there is a 50% rise in mental health-related cases for students that were recorded in the UK and 35% of college kids in America suffer from mental health-related problems can you see these red flags are is it just me? If our schools can do more to better equip children with the mindset and skills to face an uncertain and challenging future, then they should, says author lord Jim knight. I mean think about it folks would that not make more sense think about how your generation experienced the same thing the feeling of just being tossed into the world without any true knowledge but instead now your child has to experience the same thing. Except harder and I mean why harder .. the days of getting a factory job that pays well are over. Inflation is steadily getting higher according to recent studies and technology is on a rise we see cashiers now being obsolete replaced by a self-checkout robot system. This is now the new and real-world steading changing and altering forms but it's never too late to explain to your kids how this new world work. After all, if my mental health is gonna be jeopardized I can at least be employed with my college degree and not be stuck unemployed.

orange county local news report

Artist statement

the transference of education into the real world became really interested in the topic because I noticed a lot of kids would go into a career field and not even use what they went to school for in their actual jobs or most notable when millennials graduate college just to work a fast-food job because they can't get employed with their degrees. Information is the most accessible today in forms or blogs or via social media apps like Facebook but the majority of the time this information is shared is not facts. With this local newspaper article adults or young adults who read this can get raw information supported by statistics and research. Nobody wants to be handed the short end of the stick, the red queen's race hypothesis is a very potent example of why you have to adapt and evolve not just for reproduction advantage but for survival in whatever environment.