

Equality is a hard thing to come by in today's society. That is where the fable "The Thief" by Robley Wilson, Sr. comes in to the picture. The fable describes what it is like to pay for objectifying women. Sadly in society, objectifying people and making them feel lesser is something not too uncommon. As a result, ~~of~~ this objectification it ends up having many negative effects on people.

In the fable, the man's first thoughts after seeing the woman is of her beauty. "He struggles to see her face," this, alone could be seen as objectifying her. She is simply working in line to get her ticket while a man is staring at her. This brings about a feeling that many women struggle with each day. This feeling is of being objectified and constantly being looked at as if their a piece of meat being graded. While a fair portion of women don't see it as anything negative it is a way through which many feel lesser. The feeling of constantly being looked at as people have a hold on you and unless you look perfect they will not care and even talk negatively behind your back. This is the feeling that develops through this objectivity.

On the other hand, there are the people that do the staring. This man was not unlike many others with the belief that 'grass is always greener.' The man was not only taking the time out to objectify this younger lady, but he was doing it while married to another woman. After the theft he says, "Call home, have his wife get the numbers out of the top drawer," this alone shows how this man is simply looking for greener pastures. Even though he might not mean anything by looking at this woman he objectified every woman that went by him. The black haired woman clearly saw that he was just a womanizer and decided to teach him
