

This year had many bad and good outcomes starting with the pandemic that hit the whole world without warning. It's been a couple of hard days, months and not at all what we expected when the year started. No jobs, quarantined for months, deaths, losing people we love and torn up families. When it comes to my experience I didn't lose anyone to this virus which I know it's something that I should be very fortunate for and I am for it everyday. Many times I will say that it's such a bad thing that we had to be stuck at home, bored out of our minds, not able to leave the house and not able to go out with friends. However many things I have seen that also made me think that we haven't seen a glimpse of everything to be over any time soon.

Remember when I mentioned families being torn apart that is something that I see that is mentioned a lot but also so little is happening to solve that problem. I'm talking of the emotional repercussions of family separation, detention and when released. If anyone follows the news you can see how this was a major issue. Kids talking to reporters saying they want their parents back, to help them, they just want their mom and dad back. Now we are seeing families being reunited, crying and hugging their loved ones as there is no tomorrow. What changed from before and now is how the government is reacting to these changes. Based on the NBC News: How Biden administration will allow separated migrant families to reunite, it says " what we know is that 499 those are parents of children's. 499 children have not even been reached by the lawyers who so far have taken the task of ratification. When we say reach that means they haven't been able to contact those parents to see if they have been reunified." Julia Ainsley is telling us that now that Biden is in office things are changing but slowly after everything that happened during Trump presidential. More than 499 families were separated and just now they are all trying to reunite however this is just a slow process to start off there are so many cases that it can be taken care of as soon as possible as expected. I imagine that more than 499 families will need some emotional support after they come together, they will be left with a difficult memory to hold on forever.

Furthermore, now that there is a vaccine people are being released and families are getting reunited the emotional outcome they are being released too is something unimaginable. In the article pandemic 'A living hell': Inside US prisons during the COVID-19 pandemic the author writes " CDCR Press Secretary Dana Simas wrote in an email statement to Al Jazeera, noting that prisoners are provided with ongoing mental health assessments and the department is conducting crisis intervention to prevent suicides. An incarcerated person may request mental health services or they may be referred through institution staff. Mental health and operations leadership meet daily to ensure mental health referrals and requests for services from patients are quickly addressed." This is another article that illustrates that people immigrants better said they had to go to a mental health service to overcome what they are experiencing. Many of them will rather die than spend another day where they were. Others just couldn't keep enduring what they are enduring everyday, the sadness, depression hitting them, worrying how their husband or kids are. Probably asking everyday what happens if that was the last goodbye kiss they gave their kids, or last time they see them once again.

Immigrants help under so bad conditions don't necessarily get the help they deserved after being what they went through. They simply go home and get episodes or have to just deal with the situation that in the long run will affect them greatly mentally. As states in the article pandemic 'A living hell': Inside US prisons during the COVID-19 pandemic the author writes "While the pandemic will likely leave a lasting scar on those outside prison walls, experts worry the damage will be deeper on those inside them. Our mind tends to hold on to the trauma in a way that even when we're no longer in that setting of danger, our mind likes to sort of trick us into thinking we are. So even in safer settings, we still have those symptoms of PTSD and hypervigilance and being startled," explains Kirandeep Kaur, a psychiatrist who has been evaluating undocumented immigrants held in ICE detention. "Those don't go away unless there's some sort of professional help." The author illustrates the effects that got a hold on immigrants after being released some of them don't have the money to go and get professional help. So the majority are left with a trauma needed to face alone and with no guidance after they were the ones who did it to them in the first place.

Since the coronavirus started there had been many things that had impacted greatly the COVID-19 all over the state. Based on the article "Impact of COVID-19 on the Immigration System" gives an update that "Migrants and those who serve the migrant community have been among the most impacted given the Executive Office for Immigration Review's (EOIR) failure to close all immigration courts, the conditions in immigration detention (which are not conducive to social distancing), and the government's recent actions to close the Southern border to asylum seekers and others. " The recent updates illustrates that the ones who are greatly impacted on this nation wide pandemic have been the migrants since they courts have fully shut down and no one can resolve their status issues and the conditions of where they currently are in jail. As well as the government response to closing the Southern border asylum. Even though I completely agree the courts had to close I still think their should have been something the government should have done to resolve this issue instead of leaving them to die because that's how I see it up until now. The places the migrants are incarcerated don't even have the proper COVID-19 precautions in place leaving them to see who is the fittest to survival and after all this it will be a traumatic event for them. Who most likely had to see people die, getting sick and at the same time worry for their lives and children pleading for hope or any type of change at least to be released and be free instead of captivated as animals.

In conclusion, there are emotional repercussions that took a hold on immigrants. The news show is videos of families being separated, detention centers how they have immigrants there. The conditions they had to go through and it's understandable a pandemic was happening they couldn't just release these people. However I think the government could have done a better job instead of leaving them to have emotional, mentally and spiritually effects after months help in captivity and seeing the people they are with die in front of them.
