Title: New York Times Restaurant Review

This week in the New York Times food critic Pete Wells went to Frevo located at 48 West Eighth Street, Greenwich Village. It is a french american restaurant owned and managed by Franco Sampogna and Bernardo Silva. Wells states that you have to know about this place to get in, in other words that it is hard to recognize because when you go to the current address, you are stumped with what seems like an art gallery with like 6 paintings. Wells seems to like this place, states that he can not get a certain dish out of his mind. He talks about how the price is $124 for five courses which are not really new york high end but it fits the food. Pete wells says that everyone he has brought to Frevo has loved it, which can only mean he loved it as well to keep going and keep recommending the place to his friends. Overall I would actually like to come here. It sounds so fancy and I am attracted to the feeling this review gives me. I want to try these courses out and familiarize myself with such cuisine.
