I want to start by saying that I seen this image, many times before, but never have I felt comfortable looking at it. It is a powerful image because of the symbol that it represents. It represents death, fear, hate, tears, helplessness and most of all a tragically event that will forever be remember in history. The twin towers burning down show that nothing last forever, that even the tallest structures can be brought down and that there is still those who hate enough to hurt others. This picture stands out because it reminds us that we need to appreciate what we have and whom we have in our life because anything can disappear in an instant. The colors of the fire are very vivid and warm which gives out a feeling of danger.

This is a very interesting picture. It caught my attention, because it shows a man struggling to breathe while holding on to his suitcase. This shows that he is still in shock because despite the situation, despite being all beat up by dust and looking exhausted; he refuses to let go of the suit case. His body is still moving forward which show he has not given up. Ironically, there is a clock in the background. A clock around a destroyed environment and an exhausted man fighting to breath, means top me we are running out of time. I know that clock might not be intentional but still I think it's ironic. The pictures back ground are dull, but the guy is really red which shows that he is really struggling.

I picked this picture because it is one of those pictures that I can't stop staring at and feel for the people. The people look terrified and terror is something that can follow you for life. There is a lot of chaos in the city. It is obvious that every body is trying to get away from something. Some people look disoriented like the lady in the front that is holding her head. This picture has a nice shade of gray and in black and white which gives out a feel of something memorable.