

Joann Fung
Production Management I
Professor Goetz
September 18, 2011

The School of Visual Arts had an exhibition that presented “here is new york: Revisited” on Tuesday, September 13, 2011. It was held in a room with pictures clipped to thin ropes around the wall and ceiling. All the pictures were displayed in a pattern. It goes from portrait to landscape and back to portrait and so on. Most of the printed photographs have the same amount of border space around the actual picture itself. This exhibition is the tenth anniversary of 9/11 which is in the Westside Gallery. There were many pictures that caught my attention because they were filled with so much detail and had so much meaning.

This picture is when the twin towers were attacked by planes. The towers were collapsing within minutes and everyone was confused about what was going on. The shot is a full square and it captures both towers from a distance. This picture caught my eye because the plane struck within minutes and shocked everyone. The orange color of the fire stands out and demands attention from people. This picture also shows a lot of what is going on. The twin towers were being hit and everything comes tumbling down.

This picture is more focused on one person that is reading the newspaper and finding out who did this terrible act and why it happened. Many Americans were clueless and reading the newspaper provided them with information. The person's facial expression caught my eye because it doesn't really show much but explains a lot. The expression explains that he is really interested in what happened but also shows a little anger. This photograph also shows how we rely on news to get the real details and know what is really going on in the world. This picture is landscape because it's just focusing on one person reading the newspaper.

This picture caught my attention because the picture itself is a warm color but the white smoke stood out. The twin towers use to stand there but now that it's gone; the sky scraper is very bare. White also means peace but we can't have peace since there are two opposites at war. This picture is landscape to show the sky scrapers without the twin towers. Just by looking at this photograph, it feels like something is missing. Everyone is so use to seeing the two twin towers standing but since it's gone, NYC is not complete.

Even though the sky scraper is still pretty, it's like having the two towers is what holds everything down.