In the essay "Texting Short-hand Abbrevs Pervists and May Have Lasting Impact", by Seth Mydans, the author discusses the emergence of the text messaging language. Seth Mydans discusses how text messaging is a rapidly developing language in the world, but some people don't approve of the language. I agree with the author's point because Seth Mydans discusses text messaging as a rapidly developing language in terms of its world-wide usage, characteristics, and development.

Text messaging is known to be a rapidly developing language because it is used all around the world today. Seth Mydans provides evidence, "And there is evidence that some spellings are leaking out into broader use. Last November, the Scottish Qualifications Authority, which sets standards for the testing of students, said phrases like 2B R NT 2B and I LUV U would be acceptable in exam papers." This quote clearly shows that the use of text messaging is even being used to write exam papers. Another quote that supports the point is "Also late last year education officials in New Zealand said they might accept some abbreviations like WOT or WANNA or CUZ on examinations." As you can see, even Europe parts of Europe are implementing the use of text messaging in education.
