

When I started looking for internships, I wasn't looking for anything specific. I found the Electrician Apprenticeship position at The Gateway on offstagejobs.com and immediately applied just to get my resume out there. Unlike many other places that responded once to tell me the position was filled or didn't respond at all, I had an email response 5 days later, a Skype interview a few hours after that, and a job offer the next day. I was looking forward to have the chance to work in any professional theatre for the summer but what was even more exciting to me was that during my interview with the production manager, he told me that he used to work under JR (yes, City Tech's very own John Robinson! hahah) when JR was the master electrician there in the 90s. So getting the opportunity to learn from and work at a place where someone who teaches me has worked was a really cool thing.
