

Running head: SELF-ANALYSIS

Self-Analysis

Magdalena Sekscinski

New York City College of Technology

Professional Nursing Practice

NUR 4130

Professor Dato

April 15, 2015

Self-Analysis

Life is a constant battle of making choices. Throughout my career as a Registered Nurse, I have made significant efforts in achieving extensive knowledge in health care and caring for others. I began my educational journey at the Associate Degree Level and continued my Baccalaureate degree immediately following graduation. During my time at New York City College of Technology I worked hard and continued excelling academically. Since then, I have acquired a great deal of knowledge and strengths. My learning style has enabled me to take advantage of learning opportunities, and use the newly gained knowledge and skills in the work settings, clinical settings as well as the class room. Attending Baccalaureate degree opened up many doors for me in terms of employment, personal development and quality of life.

Baccalaureate degree in Nursing gave me an opportunity and taught me to deliver success on a range of care objectives by applying a focused personal integrity and work ethics as well as dedication to positive patient outcomes. My working experience and achieved education until now provided me with an excellent knowledge of traditional nursing practice, research and patient care, while developing the ability to think critically. This, coupled with attention to details, organizational and communication skills will allow me to make substantial contribution to the community. Each semester in BSN program helps me improve as a professional and human being. Constructive criticisms given by faculty helped me establish appropriate areas for learning, and I used this feedback as a learning opportunity to accomplish my personal goals. With the implementation of these strategies, I hope to gain a newfound sense of confidence that I can incorporate through both my organization and an external venue.