My personal style is based on my childhood phase of being a “tomboy” that I never really got out of with a mix of city style and stages that I am in as I continue to grow and mature. It is a direct correlation of how I feel, however, you can tell the difference between when I am styled and when I am dressed.

I would look to Kanye West, Pharrell Williams and Yohji Yamamoto as mentors to developing my personal style. It's not for reasons related to how they, themselves dress, but the attitudes they take towards fashion and how innovation, creativity and means of personal expression are always present.

I am impacted by my life experiences and surroundings. Anything involving my five senses that caused me to reminisce or reconnect draws me to recreate my style and is reflected by future outfits.

My inspiration comes from time, places, people, and my imagination. If my day's agendas lead me to encounter a shop window with a set of mannequins and products placed so perfect that it creates a story behind the display, I begin to analyze how it can relate with me and expand my taste of clothing to look for. Spotting individuals who are not afraid to dress uncommon and deny trends motivate me to bring my originality to the world as well. As long as I am awake and active I am always thinking and with each passing second more questions are being created with the urge to solve, dreams are being made for me to follow and I am in control of it all and ready to see where it all takes me.
