"I began to realize all his comments were the same, and a student who was in his group confirmed that he never read his Partner's essays before writing feedback."

In my opinion, this is not right because they are not giving their honest feedback, not helping the writer improve in areas they may lack in.

"Students would often judge their peers writing based on what they thought a teacher would want, rather than their own criteria for what makes writing good."

I sometimes do this but after reading this I now know that that is not the correct way to give feedback. ~~It is~~ The writer deserves a constructive feedback.

"By including some praise written this way, you help writers enhance their audience awareness."

~~This~~ This is an interesting quote and also true because when the writer reads a positive comment about their writing, it will encourage them to work up the good work.

"Praising well and with sincerity will help your classmates improve their writing and enhance their desire to write within a specific audience in mind."

This is true because without sincere feedback we won't know if we have to improve our writing. The more praising comments we receive, the better our writing skills are.
