When the professor introduced “repurposing” to us, I didn’t get it at first, though I think others were a little more confused than I was. But then when I heard we were going to be making a “website” using google slides, I was all for it. It sounded much more fun than writing another essay, and knowing I’d be able to make it more creative by selecting pictures and themes for it made me look forward to the assignment. The way I wanted the website to look had come to me almost immediately. I didn’t exactly know what I wanted each slide to be about, but I knew how I wanted the assignment to look, and due to my knowledge of fighting games, and the community they’re centered around, I figured there wouldn’t be many complications. So all in all, I didn’t have a difficult time constructing the slides.

I didn’t really have a plan per say when making the website. I was just going to use my original U2 writing assignment as a basis, and remake it so it would fit in the slides by adding pictures. Although, the info that I put in some of the slides didn’t fit entirely, so at times I had to split the info into two, one set for one slide, the other set for the other slide. Also, as I worked on my slides, I had to constantly adjust the text, so that it’d be easier to see it with the pictures as the background. Adding the pictures from different games for each slide had to be my favorite part of working on the assignment, so I made sure that the text in the assignment would be made to compliment the images. Sometimes I’d make the text bolder, sometimes I’d adjust the positioning, and sometimes all I had to do was change the font color, so that the text could be seen along with the picture, or at least the parts of the picture that mattered the most. The only thing that stayed constant in each slide was the positioning of the images, since I used each image as a background.

The first peer review session I went through helped my slides significantly. As a result of the critiques those in my group gave me, I changed some of the images I had with higher-quality images, and I added slides that were supposed to be included. The second round of reviews didn't help as much, but thanks to it I remembered to include my works cited slide, so it had its benefits. I feel I was able to reach my goals with the website, since I was able to have all my info on fighting games, and be able to include different images from fighting games into my slide, however I wish that I didn't have to rely on highlighting text so it could be seen better, because then it takes away from the background image slightly. I also learned that I have much more knowledge on fighting games than I first thought.

In conclusion, I feel that this assignment went rather well. There were a few ups and downs with it, but at the end I think that this assignment was the best it could be, and I don't think that there is anything I would change in it.
