Reflection

The genre I had chosen was the open letter since I felt like it was the genre for my topic, where it allowed to address all the issues that I had found in my research and let me write it all down in a way where I can address it to someone such as a politician or something but also lets me reach my target audience and beyond that. This is because while an open letter is addressed to someone specifically, it is also published publicly meaning that the general public can also view it getting to read all the information that the open letter contains and letting it spread to more than just that specific person or group.

The topic I had chosen was how low-income New Yorkers deal with healthcare in America. Why I had chosen this article is because I had always read and heard about problems that people had with the healthcare system in America, From how expensive it is, to the quality of healthcare they have, I found it interesting and wanted to learn more about the issues with this system as healthcare should be something that shouldn't be a problem for everyone, and because of this I had found out about my topic, which was how low-income New Yorkers deal with healthcare in America. Doing all this research I began to see all these issues that went along with all these different groups of people, and I got a better understand of what the issues that these people faced because of it as well as health issues that went along with it. I can understand dealing with a low-income as that's something that me and my family are familiar with it so I wanted to see what it was like with the healthcare system too.

When writing my article, I wanted to get down everything that I had found during my research and address the problems that I saw in my research. I wrote down all the negative things that I saw, included quotes, information, and everything else, to show what exactly was the problem, but I also included positive things such as solutions and how some of the issues I mentioned were being improved on. As a way to show that these issues can be fixed and aren't just some unsolvable problems, that things can be changed if they are they are focused on.

In this open letter though I had found some things to be difficult, which was the tone of the open letter, I wanted it to sound critical and yet still sound somewhat nice both in the tone but also in how it's written, I wanted to include all the information I had found without it being too much and overwhelming. There was also how I wanted to include the information that I had, what I wanted to include and what I felt like wasn't necessary.
