

Huimei Liao

ENG 1101

Unit 3 Part 2

11/30/2023

Word count: 1014

Reflection in Climate Change

The intentional audience for my topic: climate change would be Americans over the age of eighteen. The genre I picked is street art. I chose this because street art is important in our society. It makes people stop walking and think deeply. Sometimes people are so busy or ignorant that they ignore everything else but themselves. Street art can draw people's attention because it is easy to look at images. It does not require much energy like reading. Especially when it comes to climate change. Some don't even believe it is a real thing. Street art can give people visual shocks and draw people's attention with little effort. It is good for society as it can give people warnings about what is going on. It can connect with people through the eyes. In addition, it can connect with those who have a reading disability. The power of art is strong. Some may feel like their action won't choose anything so they stay quiet and indifferent. However, street art can change that. It can show the strength that people tend to fail to see in them. In other words, street art can inspire and motivate people to see their potential and how strong their power can be when it comes to stepping in and resolving a major issue.

To be more specific, the major audience in target is the younger generations in America, such as Gen Z and the Millennials. This is because they are America's future. Thus, they have the right to know the truth regarding global warming instead of being lied to by the government as the Republicans refuse to believe that it is a real thing. This is a very serious issue because the Republican side of the government can influence their followers. In other words, misinformation about climate change would be spread among people who identify as Republicans. Moreover, the Republicans have 222 seats and the Democrats have 213 seats in Congress. This raises a serious concern as bills must be passed based on votes on behalf of Congress members before going to the president for further consideration. If the Republican side disapproves of a bill then it won't even make it to the president. Since the Republicans refuse to believe climate change is a real thing, it is almost impossible to get a bill that improves climate change to go to the president. Under these circumstances, misinformation mustn't get out and confuse society. To resolve this conflict about the Republicans' position on climate change, Americans need to stand up and protest against them.

The intentional audience for my topic: climate change would be Americans over the age of eighteen. The genre I picked is street art. I chose this because street art is important in our society. It makes people stop walking and think deeply. Sometimes people are so busy or ignorant that they ignore everything else but themselves. Street art can draw people's attention because it is easy to look at images. It does not require much energy like reading. Especially when it comes to climate change. Some don't even believe it is a real thing. Street art can give people visual shocks and draw people's attention with little effort. It is good for society as it can give people warnings about what is going on. It can connect with people through the eyes. In addition, it can connect with those who have a reading disability. The power of art is strong. Some may feel like their action won't choose anything so they stay quiet and indifferent. However, street art can change that. It can show the strength that people tend to fail to see in them. In other words, street art can inspire and motivate people to see their potential and how strong their power can be when it comes to stepping in and resolving a major issue.

To be more specific, the major audience in target is the younger generations in America, such as Gen Z and the Millennials. This is because they are America's future. Thus, they have the right to know the truth regarding global warming instead of being lied to by the government as the Republicans refuse to believe that it is a real thing. This is a very serious issue because the Republican side of the government can influence their followers. In other words, misinformation about climate change would be spread among people who identify as Republicans. Moreover, the Republicans have 222 seats and the Democrats have 213 seats in Congress. This raises a serious concern as bills must be passed based on votes on behalf of Congress members before going to the president for further consideration. If the Republican side disapproves of a bill then it won't even make it to the president. Since the Republicans refuse to believe climate change is a real thing, it is almost impossible to get a bill that improves climate change to go to the president. Under these circumstances, misinformation mustn't get out and confuse society. To resolve this conflict about the Republicans' position on climate change, Americans need to stand up and protest against them.

The younger generation will be the ones suffering in the future if they fail to draw their attention to this serious issue. The only way for the younger generation to get their voices heard is to vote and be involved with the government to propose actual plans. Thus, the younger generation must have the acknowledgment of the whole voting process and election process if they want to run for office. All in all, all Americans should join this battle to fight for America's future. The street art I have created will present my audience with the horrible state we are in. The Earth is melting away and it is going to continue to melt faster if nothing is done to stop climate change. My street art presents a warning or alert to everyone, especially the younger generations in America. It would inspire them to fight back as they need to stand up and act fast before it is too late.

Work cited:

Dunlap, Riley E., and Araon M. McCright. "A widening gap: Republican and Democratic views on Climate Change." Environment: Science and Policy for Sustainable Development, vol. 50, no. 5, 2008, pp. 26–35, <https://doi.org/10.3200/envt.50.5.26-35>. accessed 11.4.2023

Hencz, Adam. "What Is Street Art? History & Famous Artists." Artland Magazine, 23 Nov. 2023, magazine.artland.com/street-art/.