Unit 2 Reflection Annotated Bibliography

Introduction

In recent years, there has been a growing concern regarding the treatment of inmates in prisons. One striking observation is the stark contrast between men's and women's prisons, with men often experiencing worse treatment than their female counterparts. This disparity in treatment raises in the midst of questions about the gender equality and fairness of our criminal justice system. That raises the question: Why does men's prison have worse treatment than women's prison?

I can't say, I had a shocking experience because terrible things happen to people in jail. The government knows too but still won't do anything to keep prisoners safe no matter how many people get beaten, raped, etc every day and the government just proves to us every day they don't care about the people in the criminal justice system and protect its people even if they're in corrections or not.

The show provides a firsthand look at the challenges faced by both inmates and correctional staff, offering insights into the psychological and emotional impact of incarceration.

I was surprised that they had actual civilians in prisons living among actual prisoners like they weren't scared of being around criminals for 60 days. But to learn that by placing civilians amid these dynamics, the show provides a firsthand account of the struggles and dangers faced by the inmates and the efforts of correctional officers to maintain order and safety. Also, it offers insights into the power dynamics, social hierarchies, and survival strategies within the prison community, as well as the personal growth and challenges experienced by the participants as they navigate this unfamiliar and often hostile environment.

Conclusion

In conclusion, the perceived disparity in treatment between men's and women's prisons underscores the need for a comprehensive examination of the prison system and a commitment to ensuring equitable and humane treatment for all individuals within the criminal justice system. During my research on the topic, I discovered several reasons why men's prisons are often considered worse than female prisons. One reason is the higher rates of violence and aggression among male prisoners. Men tend to engage in more physical confrontations, resulting in a more hostile and dangerous environment. There are several reasons why Men's prisons are worse than women's prisons is an important aspect to consider when discussing the overall topic. Firstly, men's prisons tend to have higher rates of violence and aggression. This can create a more dangerous and hostile environment, both for the inmates and the staff. Additionally, men's prisons often have overcrowding issues, which can lead to even more tension and conflict among the inmates. Several groups of people should understand why men's prisons are generally worse than female prisons. Firstly, policymakers and lawmakers need to be aware of this disparity to address the issues within the prison system. Understanding the reasons behind the harsher conditions in male prisons can help inform decisions about reform and allocation of resources. researchers and academics studying criminal justice and gender disparities should be familiar with this topic to further their understanding of the systemic issues at play. It is also essential for prison administrators and staff to recognize the differences between male and female prisons, as this knowledge can help them develop appropriate policies and procedures that address the specific challenges faced by male inmates. Finally, the general public should be informed about the conditions in male prisons to foster a greater sense of empathy and support for criminal justice reform efforts. By raising awareness about the reasons why men's prisons tend to be worse than female prisons, we can work towards creating a more equitable and humane prison system for all individuals.
