Final Reflection

Final reflection

I have mostly learned about myself, I like to write mostly about social issues and reading about it. It does let me know what is going on in society today and what can affect me and everyone around. This semester I feel like it was an eye opener. I feel that what the teacher assigned us this semester helped me develop more in my writing. It was a mix of information but also your ideas and writing. Learning multiple strategies, using your emotions in your learning, grabbing the readers attention, telling your story. In college when I need to write or create a poster I would already have some ideas on how to do so. In the beginning of the semester I really felt prepared for unit 2 assignment because unit 1 assignment helped me prepare by already helping understand how to talk about a social justice issue. I became more creative because each assignment was almost the same thing but some more added to it. One about what I have to say, second one was information collected from sources but also what I have to say, third was what I have already gathered in the second one and combined with images to express my writing. I expected to learn about writing strategies, different readings, readings that made a difference in the world. I feel actually very confirmed with this class. It was more than what I expected in a good way. This class helped me understand text better, I don't read much but and this teacher showed me things that really interested me. I would say that what was the most challenging was to come up with ideas to talk about, for me I get a bit nervous talking about a topic that I'm afraid I have not that much to say on. Just like the first Unit 1 when the teacher explained how to find a discourse community to talk about I really was so confused because I thought I was limited until she said it can be anything that becomes a goal in a community. Then I got something from my life that I connected to and understood that it happens to other people also, I would give advice to students taking this course next year is look at writing as something that is terrible and boring, look at it as a way to tell your versions of things you believe in.
