After the independence of the United States in 1776 in the thirteen colonies which were located in the eastern part of the country. We can see that in the southern part it was where there were more slaves, who were forced to work in the fields.

Many Americans based on their economic status could buy people of African American origin as slaves in markets.

but all this came to an end in the year 1861-1865 after the battle of the civil war.

This battle was the product of the southern region that every day wanted to exploit more and more the Afro-Americans they had in their power with more forced labor without the right to pay or freedom. That is why in the northern part of the thirteen colonies the slaves were almost free due to technological advances in plants and infiltration for work in the fields and they did not need to exploit their slaves too much. Slavery was abolished by the Emancipation Proclamation of 1863, promulgated by President Abraham Lincoln.

Many families were free but the Americans never treated African Americans the same

after the war,
since then it was born in Americans to feel superior to African Americans
because they had all the power in the country. Thus,
African

African Americans rent properties to live at a high cost and work in the fields for a small salary.

In one way or another, making slaves of the African Americans again in order to survive.

One of the laws that came out at that time was that of -JIM CROW- which consists of segregating African Americans with African Americans, in other words creating places for areas for people of color and white people with supposedly equal treatment.

Schools were divided, cinemas, restaurants according to your skin color, and always giving preference to (white) Americans.

in other words, segregation was another type of slavery.

But in 1957 Martin Luther King Jr was key so that this segregation was eliminated little by little.

He was part of many peaceful protests to make color matching a fact but not all Americans agreed, thus silencing his voice at an early age (39 years). After that, segregation came to an end in 1965 almost 100 years after the civil war. Since 1965, many African Americans have struggled to fulfill their dreams of reaching places of authority such as President Barack Obama was from 2008-2016.

But this has been all happiness since many Americans have not agreed since their power was abused in police abuses, this was key to the Black Live Matter movement created in 2013. But their greatest knowledge was in 2020 where people from all over the world protested in the streets for the abuse of African Americans.

This project was of great inspiration to bring equality to all parts of the world regardless of skin color, religion, or culture, because we are all equal and deserve the same rights and treatment.
