When the professor announces that I've must repurposing one of my old assignments between my genre and discourse community. I've honestly thought that this website project will be easy to complete. After, I've seen the openlab project I went straight towards to creating my website just to getting over with. On that same day that I've received an email about the project. I had done an all-nighter to complete the project. In addition, my initial plans for building the website as I was trying to get into the mind of someone that was trying to get into soccer. Furthermore, what were the things I like to know about soccer, but in simple terms that anyone can understand it? After, I've planned out what I wanted in my website and the information that is going to be in the slides of my website. I had checked my genre essay and pick out which information will be complemental into my website and added a few pictures and video links. As a result, getting all of that information it made starting my website much more easier to work on. Following, I had completed my project just how I've planned out to be from my initial plans. Next, I send to my peers in my group hoping to get useful information to improve my website, but 2 out of 5 peers had given great feedback that I've would implement into my website. So, I've felt that the second peer review didn't really help my website because the people I've got in my group weren't helpful. They only told me to add more pictures into my website or it was good enough that it didn't really need to be changed/added on. For the only two people that gave me useful information that was beneficial of my website. For example, write an about "who is this website is specifically towards to", add a work cited slide, and implements links into a home page for each slide of my website. After the peers review, I've just added all of my partners applicable information. Lastly, The only things that my partners didn't say anything about it are I've to add on more information into my history slide about soccer because I have only one sentence for that slide. In addition, what I had learned from the process of this project is if they're something that I'm really passionate and knowledgeable it makes work/project really easy and fast to complete. Plus, this process has shown me that I'm doing better then certain people in writing/website creating. Also, that each English assignment my uses of higher-level vocabulary uses is getting better in my writing and in real life uses.
