Discourse community

This is my unit 3 project. I decided to do it on my discourse community, where I choose Facebook.

Facebook is an online community in which you can communicate with friends and meet new people. To be a member on Facebook, first you have to make an account which is very simple, all you have to do is put your name, date of birth, gender, and email address. Once you make your account you can start looking for your friends and add them to your friend's list, by doing this you will be able to comment their status and pictures and you will also be able to write on their walls.

The main goal of Facebook is fast and easy communication with friends and family. When I need to ask for example my cousin a question about anything I just write on his wall on facebook since he lives quite far I don't see him often. Also, if you want to see interesting videos, gossip or anything similar, facebook has it all. Some of the typical genres would be all the comments people leave on walls, photos, videos or activities. You could also send a private message if you don't want the whole world to see what you write.

I think Facebook is a very fun way to communicate not only with friends but also with family. It's an online community that doesn't have a formal way of writing because you can write how and whatever you want, you can write in English, Spanish, French, German or in any language you want.

So Facebook was the discourse community I have been in or I am still in. It involves online communication. Over all I think it`s a discourse community that I like because it allows me to communicate, share and learn different things that may make me a better person and which in general are part of me.
