Process Essay

When I was introduced to the idea of repurposing our previous writing assignment, I was confused on how we were supposed to format and make it look different. After reading the full assignment, I was concerned on how I was supposed to format and "repurpose" my old writing assignment. I did not want my website to sound the same, so I re read my essay and gathered new information so I can rephrase and make my information sound different. Once I began to take a concrete form in my mind, I began to scale and find images surrounding mental health such as drawn heads and brains. My initial plan was to talk about one of my sources from my genre essay, but now that I have finished my website, I did not add one of my main sources. I did not want to explain that source because then my website would have been too long, being a downside to reader because they do not want to read too much about a certain topic. Often times people can over write which makes them sound repetitive. This is a negative factor which I tried to avoid. Something that was altered was my images. In the begging I only had two images, but afterwards I had to add more. I added a great video to my website, which I've seen prior to making the new assignment. The video was key because it explains in detail how Latinos or Hispanics are affected surrounding mental health.

For my first peer reviews, I received little feedback. Since my website was very detailed and showed all the requirements, there was not much to fix or add. I was unsure what I could change around to improve my website. The only feedback or defects that was found from my peers was that I should add more pictures to my home page. For one of my peers, my text from a slide were being covered from my image. I did not add more images to my home because it looks cleaner and more professional to keep it as it is. I wanted to avoid my home screen to look over crowded with different images. For my second peer review, I did not get any beneficial feedback. I only was told that my background color was too bland, grey. I did not change it because my website is meant to look simplistic, clean, formatted to one color.

I felt as I was able to produce my website just how I wanted successfully. I believe that the final results came out great because of the way I formatted it. I definitely reached my initial goals, which was to talk about mental health and demonstrate the important factors or roles that play in minority lives. Something I learned about myself through this process was how I am very detail oriented and like things to look precise. Now that I have reached the end, I don't think that I would change anything as it looks good as it is.
