I have learned a lot from myself this semester in the specific aspect as a reader and a writer. In the beginning of the semester I was highly motivated and had all my attention focused on doing my best. Which made me realize that now I look for details I write in detail so I won't forget what I learned in the reading or what I'm writing about.

I changed my reading habits this semester. I've had to do plenty of reading and not only for this class. But with this class specifically I would reread or re-watch in order to really understand what the assignment was looking for. I've also tried to ask for help when I've needed it, getting out of my comfort zone.

I enjoyed Antigone in Ferguson because of the way Antigone was introduced with an event that happened in real life. They found a way to connect both realities from Antigone and the shooting. They had even included different perspectives such as having conversations with police officers. One thing is to be in the action doing your job another thing is being the victim and being the bystander trying to get both sides while still having an opinion.

I also enjoyed the research project for units two and three. I picked the topic child abuse because I related to it. I've seen various cases from Netflix documentaries such as Gabriel Fernandez. He was an innocent child being neglected and abused not only by his mom but by his stepfather.

Both Antigone in Ferguson and the research project were different genres but I enjoyed reading, watching, and writing about both. Although they're different genres they have a meaningful impact that takes place. They're trying to send a message to the audience to better understand what's really going on around the world.

This class in general includes lots of note taking and I would take that with me in any future English class that I take. Also, rereading at least three times going back to the reading to make sure I didn't miss anything.

After each assignment I feel like I will go back to revise unit three. I did a poster but missed the reflection so I would go back to add more information onto the poster and give in my reflection. I feel as if I should've put a specific website that could help others and to make it look more realistic as possible.
