Modern Photomontage

Ben Goossens

- Born in Belgium in the year of 1935, Ben Goossens knew his calling was art at an early age. At age 16 he began to get interested in illustration and photography. All through school art was his main focus and with 15 years of darkroom experience, his job as an art director in advertising was not a coincidence. He later developed his unique style in surrealism as a result of his prior experiences. Once Photoshop was complete and running it completely changed the way he did things and his art became even more..surreal.

Sean Hillen

- Sean Hillen, (1961-Present) is an artist whose work includes collages and the creative use of photographs. He has created a bodies of work known as Irelantis, Newgrange, The Cliffs of Moher, Trinity College and O'Connell Street. This body of work consist of a collection of scalpel-and-glue collages. It is a bizarre hybrid of the everyday postcard visuals combined with an imaginary world. Most of these collages show landmarks from around Ireland, are no bigger than a postcard. A lost of Sean Hillen's work is iunfluenced by the likes of John Hinde and even John Heartfield. This influence can be seen especially in Hillen's more political montages of the Troubles in Northern Ireland. Hillen adapts what he refers to as "nostalgic" images, in which he puts familiar tourist location shots to create an a and complex phtomontage.

Scott Mutter

- Scott Mutter (1944–2008) was an American photographer who is mostly remembered for his unique style of photomontage. Most of Mutter's work was done with images of and around the Chicago area, Mutter was never comfortable with being considered a surrealist, so he decided to coin the term "Surrational Images" to describe his work. Mutter never transitioned to Photoshop and mostly computers in general. However, he recreated every original print in his darkroom as he thought this was the only way that they were his own unique work and style. From the few existing originals of each piece he had completed he would select the ones that he considered to be the most appropriate for reproduction as posters. Sergei Eisenstein, a Russian filmmaker greatly influenced Mutter's ideas about photomontage, a technique of combining and superimposing images into a single picture. Mutter believed there are theoretical and philosophical reasons why a montage works as a true piece of art. But Scott always tried to understand and keep an mind open about what works. Scott Mutter's bottom line was always that His "images are an attempt to represent something that is reality, but not a physical reality, but a representation through metaphor"
