My name is Rama Beidak and I was born in Lattakia, Syria. At the age of two my father traveled back and forth from Syria to America, and at the age of three we permanently moved to Brooklyn, New York. My father decided to settle in New York due to the lifestyle he found to be fit enough to raise five kids, as well as the job offerings. When I first came to America I was at the age where I had just started to understand and speak, although I communicated with my parents in arabic, english came easier to me because of school. As I was raised in Brooklyn, it was typical to be a pizza lover, and still today I remain to chose pizza with a side of any pasta over anything. Being raised in New York city it involved a lot of diversity, not just the food, the music as well. Whether it was a different language, or genre anything caught my attention, and amazed me, and that wasn't hard because I was surrounded by different cultures and traditions. As I worked my way up the public school system I finally made it to college hoping to pursue my dream of becoming an optometrist. My main goal in my classes and these six years to come is to remain positive and focused no matter how many times I fail.
