Outline

I : Introduction

1. Attention grabber : Ask and/or mention something general about education that will make the reader pause for a second and think about what you just said.
2. Say your answer to whatever was just said then drag it on to lead to your thesis
3. State thesis clearly (in this case) incidents from school and the ways it affected me later on in life

II : Body Paragraph 1

1. Mention first incident : Being called stupid by my teacher in 1st grade then explaining how it went down
2. Talk about how it shaped my relationship to education
3. Shed light on what this experience could tell you about the american school system being very unprofessional at times and how every teacher isn't necessarily fit to be one
4. Reflect on how this experience enabled me to understand something specific about learning (especially at a young age) and how it reflects on the world/communities I inhabit

III : Body Paragraph 2

1. Mention Second Incident : High School from hell
2. Talk about how it shaped my relationship to school
3. Explain how this experience relates to several kinds of social issues (racism, sexism, homophobia, and mental illness)

4. Reflect on experience then talk about how it made me understand how writing could be used as an outlet to express yourself and how it reflects on the world/communities I inhabit

IV. Conclusion

1. Restate thesis
2. Talk about how said incidents and the outcomes later on are proof that you can come back from just about anything once you stop letting it get to you and actually pick yourself up
3. Finish off with attention grabbing outro to go out with a bang
