

Audio Machine

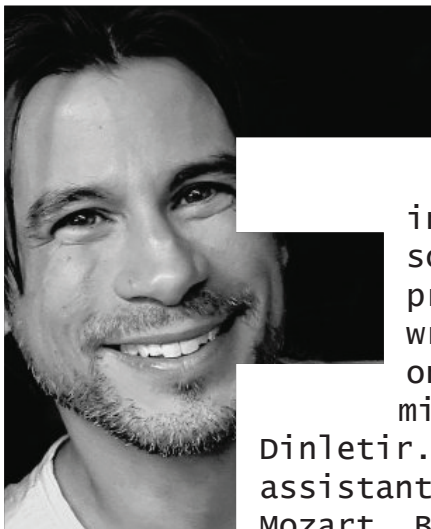

MACHINE

is an American production music company located in Beverly Hills, California. It's main comody is producing music for movie trailers and advertisements.

FOUNDERS

Paul Dinletir initially just played piano and wanted to be a songwriter and jazz pianist. His wife was able to get him into a film and television music UCLA taught by Robert Eto11, who is now a collaborator. This led to him becoming a composer for X-Ray Dog where he composed trailers for cartoons (such as Samurai Jack until season 4) and reality TV shows; from that he saw the enjoyment he got from trailer music and eventually did that full time. Dinletir's influences are Mozart, Beethoven, Debussy; he regularly listens to soundtracks.[11] He used Logic Pro software for 15 years and switched to Steinberg Cubase.

Kevin Rix started out playing guitar and was in various rock bands growing up. At music school, where he was introduced to classical music and jazz, he started realizing his interests in composing and in working with different instruments and sounds. After a few years he decided to do it professionally. At first he wanted to get into writing film soundtracks. While he was working on a demo reel, he obtained a job editing and mixing ringtones for a company, where he met Dinletir. He started in the profession as Dinletir's assistant doing sound design. Rix's influences include Mozart, Bach, Debussy, Rush, Mastodon, Soundgarden, Hans Zimmer, and Harry Gregson-Williams.

AUDIOMACHINE

Olympic

As the company (Audio Machine) grew, their music eventually became featured in the Olympic Games dated back since 2010.

Games

Over the years, many audiomachine's tracks have been featured in theatrical movie trailers such as Avatar and The Chronicles of Narnia

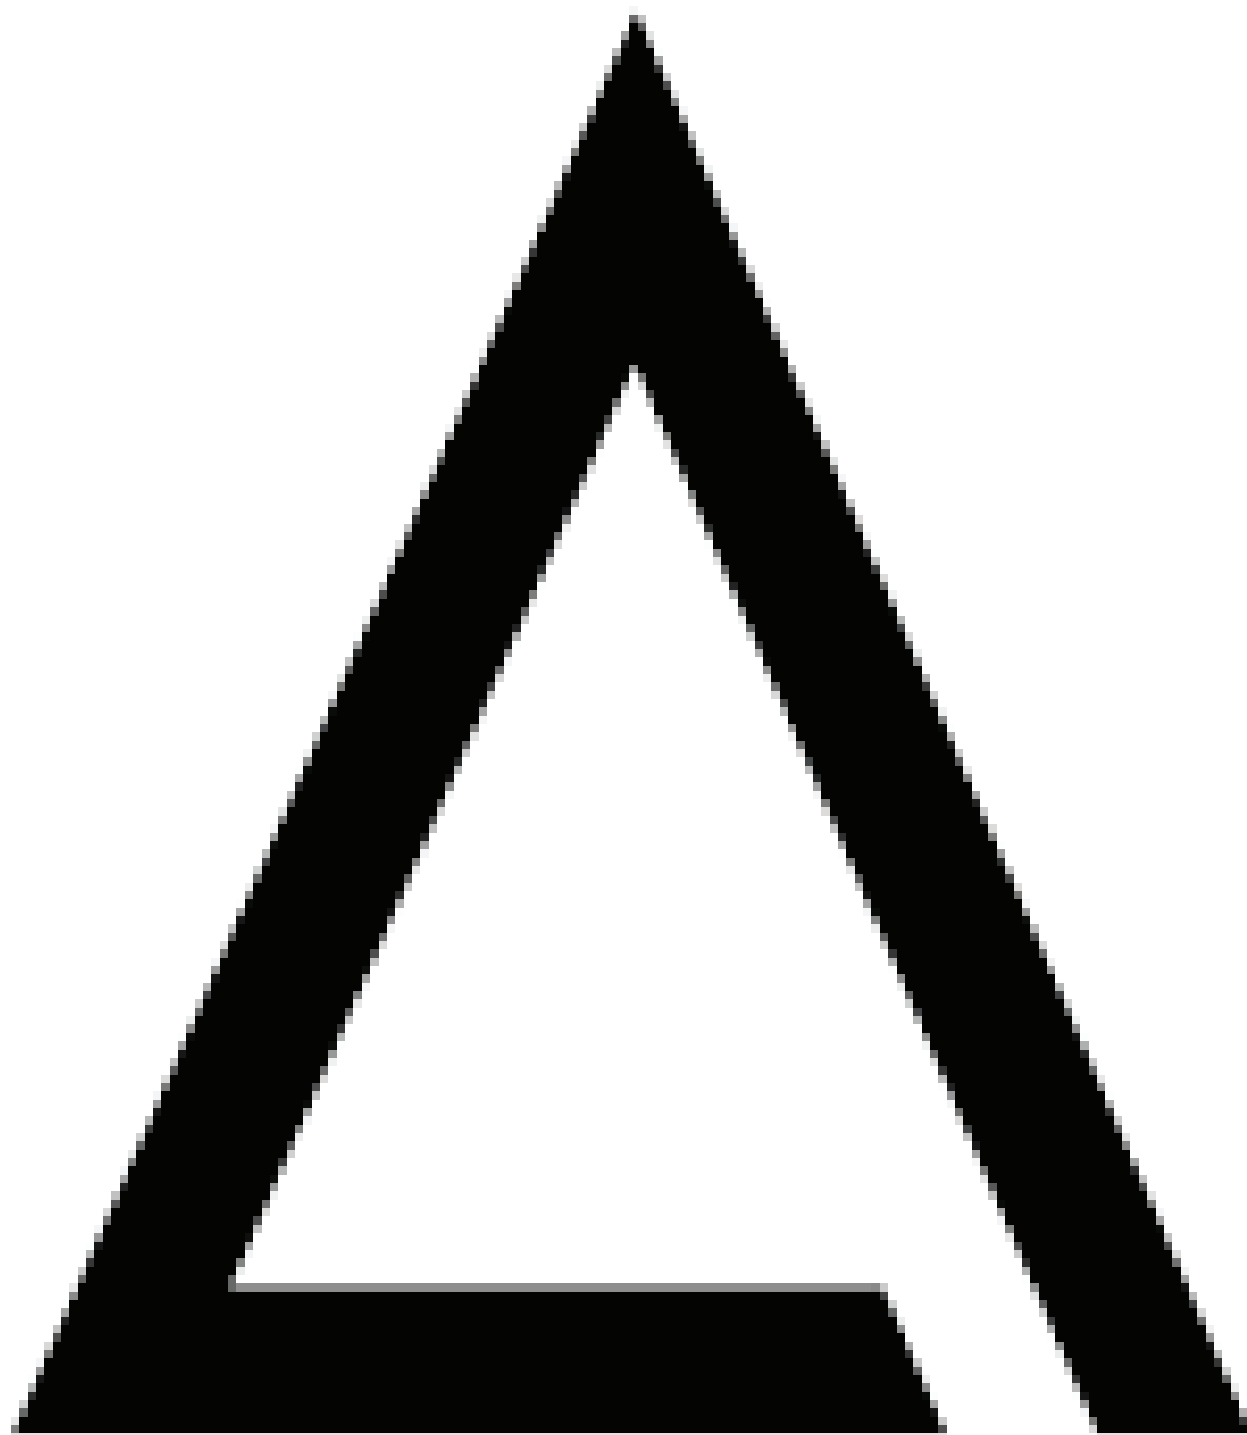

Other films included in the masterpiece is Iron Man, Venom and of course, the blockbuster movie of 2019 Avengers: Endgame.

Originally, Audio machine released albums specifically for the film industry's professional use, but since 2012 it's been releasing selected albums and compilations for the general public.
