Clerestory- Upperpart of the nave, choir, and transepts of a large church containing a series of windows. It is clear of the roofs of the aisles and admits light to the central parts of the building.

Triforium- is an interior gallery, opening onto the tall central space of a building at an upper level

Gallery- any covered passage that is open at one side

Aisle- passage way to either side of the nave that is separated from the nave by colonnades or arcades

Arcade- a covered passageway with arches along one or both sides

Flyer- the outdoor semi-arch support connects with buttress to the main structure

Buttress- a projecting support of stone (brick built against a wall)

Crypt- an underground room or vault beneath a church/a stone chamber beneath the floor of a church

Rose Window- large circular stained glass windows found in gothic churches

Lancet- is a variety of pointed arch in which each of the arcs, or curves, of the arch have a radius longer than the width of the arch

Tracery- is the stonework elements that support the glass in a gothic window

Quadripartite- a groined vault over a rectangular area, the area defined by ribs on each side and divided into four parts by intersecting diagonals.
