

5. Yezierska would rather not always have to use her hands while working. She said "I want to do something with my head, my feelings. All day long, only with my hands I work." This would all be possible except that she didn't know English.
6. I think the author's argument that immigrants should receive free room and board is very strong. Comparing immigrants to criminals in prison was a very smart idea that made me agree. I agree because I personally feel like they're are more immigrants that Americans in America and they should be entitled to more things.
7. Yezierka learnt that America is basically what you make it. She leant that in other to be America she needed to be less dependent and just do what she needed to survive with would later mean that there really isn't any "America". Yezierka lean to that to succeed she had to give, small it great. Yes. I agree with her assessment.
8. The author uses "hunger" and "appetite" to show her determined Yezirska was. Not only hunger for food but hungry to somewhat fit it.
