

I think I was about 15 when I decided I wanted to write stories. Not stories like in novels, comics to be specific. I've had a passion for drawing and have created many characters that I've been infatuated with. So I thought to myself one day "Hey I should write a story".

Growing up I've watched a wide variety of shows and have taken in tons of media. Using these platforms and also what I learned in school, I continuously draw characters and create story concepts for comics I would like to create in the future. My favorite part of all this however is writing characters.

Characters are my favorite component of a story. I took AP english in high school where I read Macbeth for the first time and it instantly became my favorite Shakespeare play. I became very interested in Macbeth as a character, someone who betrayed the people close to him and was corrupted by the promise of power which lead to his demise. When writing a character's journey through my stories I try to create one as fascinating and complex as Macbeth, especially if it's a main character or villain.
